

Ghost Village

The Seminole says little to a white man so we must travel to ghost villages that lie hidden on hammock islands.
We cut a tunnel through jungle walls until we find charred chickee posts.

We peel away the dirt and roots and glimpse the barest flicker of their life that seeps from midden shell and blue glass beads and have our conversation with their trash.

I hear the wind that fans the highest branches and raise my eyes to the canopy
of vine and thorn
that shrouds the summer sky.
“We are gone”
says a voice in the wind.
“Our soul has been taken by the owl.
We are gone.”
